Q: Difference between movable-axis and single-axis i2c chipconverters I'm trying to get two axis working as expected from a HMC5883L i2c chip connected to a Arduino Nano. I've tried two different chip converters in order to get different outputs from the device. First: Second: According to this datasheet: Movable-Axis Chip Converter This 12-bit-resolution, 20-micro-amp-output chip converter is different from the single-axis chip converter. The movable-axis chip converter has two linear motors, with one that moves in the x-direction and one in the y-direction. The chip is configured as a four-channel 12-bit resolution converter, and can receive commands from up to 128 clients. I found the second one on ebay and the seller provided documentation. He specified his "movable-axis" chip as not "single-axis" or "i2c only", and recommended using it with Windows 10 Arduino IDE 1.0.5 I installed the software and the arduino IDE, and uploaded the code (link). I get the right output on the output pin while dragging the stylus across the device (left/right = x, up/down = y). When I let go, the force value is displayed on the right serial monitor. Why do I have to use two channels, why doesn't a single-axis i2c work? The chip is apparently consuming the same power. What could be different in the two cases? A: Movable-axis axis is not the same as single-axis. The reason is that the data sheet you

She said that society might be ready to consider sperm donation but the law was still too restrictive. “This is about clearing the law to ensure that people can donate sperm easily, as part of making marriage easier,” she said. The UK’s sperm bank Association said the bill would create an entirely new market for donors and strengthen the donor register. “The Sperm Register is already in place to protect women from having children by men they don’t know,” said spokesman James

Sweeney. He said he hoped that the time when a woman's husband or partner could decide to donate sperm in secret would never come. The Association said the new law would allow women access to sperm donors they had never met, ending the secrecy which exists in the UK, and also creating a culture of more open relationships. "Ultimately we hope the new law will stop men who are not committed to the women they impregnate trying to protect their reputations and do to women what they have already done to men,” he said. A debate on the bill takes place today in the Lords. The draft legislation was agreed by MPs on the devolved legislation in Scotland and Wales in February. It was drafted by the Department of Health, after consultation with the Scottish Sperm Bank Association. The bill will be debated in the Lords today. The Home Affairs Select Committee and the Health Select Committee will report back on the bill before it is brought to the House of Lords. “This is an important step forward in our attempts to change attitudes towards sperm donation,” said the Scottish Parliament’s health spokesperson, Jackie Baillie. “It is time that women and couples who are prepared to make a lifelong commitment are given equal rights to men’s sperm.” A spokeswoman for the Welsh Assembly said the measure was intended to widen the donor pool. “This [new law] is one of the first pieces of devolved legislation in the life sciences area, but the intention is the same as the legislation introduced in Scotland. The ability to choose a donor should
