Our purpose was to determine the effect of a vasodilator hepatic artery infusion (HAI) on endogenous and exogenous human endothelin 1 (ET-1) mediated responses in the human umbilical vein (HUV). Fresh autologous blood was drawn from neonatal umbilical cords and placed in heparinized syringes. The blood was infused through the umbilical artery and returned to the vein in a circuit by a peristaltic pump. After the pump was shut off for 30 s to allow clot to form, the circuit was flushed with Ringer's lactate. The tip of the catheter was placed in the vein for drug administration and venous blood was sampled for measurement of ET-1 concentrations. After administration of HAI of the vasodilator, sargamostim (sargo), or Ringer's lactate for 30 min, HUV rings with or without ET-1 were mounted in organ chambers. Sargo alone had no effect on the HUV rings. ET-1 contracted ring segments with and without sargo (n = 8) in the presence of 10(-5) M sargamostim, whereas ET-1 contracted rings without sargo in the presence of 10(-5) M sargamostim (n = 7). However, the ring segments showed a dose-dependent contraction to ET-1 in all cases (n = 8). Ten to the 6th power M sargamostim did not affect the ET-1 response in any of the rings. These results suggest that sargamostim interferes with the function of endothelin in the umbilical vein.= 1) and LBR = 0 (B = 0) to patients without placenta accreta (P = 0, B = 1) and LBR◆
