During manufacture of semiconductor devices, such as integrated circuits (ICs), photolithography is used to form the semiconductor device. A semiconductor wafer may be coated with a resist layer. The resist layer is then exposed to radiation, and the exposed areas may then be removed, creating a pattern on the wafer. The remaining resist layer may be removed to leave a patterned resist layer on the wafer. The patterned resist layer may then be developed, and a process of etching may remove portions of underlying layers. During the etching, byproducts of the etching process may be mixed in gas streams flowing to the etching chamber.

These byproducts may include polymerized resist material. The byproducts may fall on the wafer. The byproducts may penetrate the resist layer and contaminate the underlying layers. Although the technology is decades in the future, Boeing's Dynamic Entry Maneuvering (DEM) concept is much more advanced than the retropropulsion system tested in the X-47B in March and April. "Our SLS module is a lot bigger than the

X-47B," said Larry Price, NASA deputy associate administrator for operations at the agency's Marshall Space Flight Center. "Our SLS module is about twice the size of the X-47B. The SLS is much more complex than the X-47B, and also much more complex than a traditional landing configuration." SLS is now ready to fly, although NASA and the aircraft manufacturer are trying to keep the concept secret until as late as possible. The long-delayed Advanced Orion and Cygnus spacecraft will be lofted on the same rocket. The experimental Boeing SLS module will use powerful forward boosters as its "feet," gaining velocity from the exhaust of those rockets. The boosters are jettisoned after eight and a half minutes, and NASA will use four smaller boosters called "elements" to redirect the spacecraft's path. The current plan is to capture the Boeing module in a lasso around the third stage of the SLS and use its service module as the craft's center of gravity. The service module is jettisoned toward the end of the SLS's nine minute reign, when the smaller stages burn up. "We hope to catch it in a lasso, but that's not the only way to catch it," said Jerry Loden, Boeing's vice president of the Exploration Systems and
