The aim of this retrospective study was to compare the differences in the marginal bone levels (MBLs) of the gingival and palatal surfaces of the mandibular central incisors in orthodontically treated and untreated children. For the orthodontically treated group, 100 untreated Japanese orthodontic patients from the archives of the Department of Orthodontics, Tohoku University Dental School, Iwate, Japan, were included. For the untreated group, 25 Japanese orthodontic patients from two orthodontic clinics in Tokyo, Japan, were enrolled. MBLs were measured on photographs of the study models taken after orthodontic treatment (7.5-10.5 years old), and photographs of the study models were taken 6 months after orthodontic treatment was completed. MBLs were measured at the gingival and palatal surfaces of the mandibular central incisors at the vestibule, midpoint, and lingual surface levels. The relationship between MBLs and age was analyzed using the paired t test. MBLs in the orthodontically treated group were significantly larger than those in the untreated group at every measured level at the gingival and palatal surfaces. MBLs were significantly smaller in the orthodontically treated group than in the untreated group at every measured level at the midpoint and the lingual surface levels at the gingival surface, as well as at the vestibule and lingual surface levels at the palatal surface. The results of the current study suggested that orthodontically treated children had more favorable MBLs in both the gingival and palatal surfaces of the mandibular central incisors than untreated children.
