A typical commercial label press consists of a printing plate mounted on a web backing, the backing serving as an endless belt which is driven around the platen. The printing plate is typically a sheet of engraved metal which bears text and/or graphics to be applied to the moving web. In order for the plate to be operative, it must be engaged with the platen. The platen is a pliable elastic member, usually a rubber or polyester belt, which engages the printing plate. As the belt presses the plate against the moving web, graphics appear on the web and may be printed in an endless pattern. Each platen is typically fitted with adjustable clamps that secure the printing plate, so that the printing plate may be adjusted to accommodate different text and/or graphics to be printed. Clamps may also be used in connection with different types of media. For example, different types of media may require different types of grippers. U.S. Pat. No. 6,238,007 to Kohn et al. teaches the use of clamps to hold a thin media sheet and a thick media sheet, in combination, by locking the thin media plate at the edge of the belt and offsetting the position of the thick media plate. It is a constant challenge to design the process, such that the equipment can be utilized most efficiently to produce the desired product. Also, this process should continue to be 0cc13bf012
