[Effect of hyaluronic acid of different concentrations on articular cartilage damage and subchondral bones of the rabbit knee joints]. To investigate the effect of hyaluronic acid of different concentrations on articular cartilage damage and subchondral bone of the rabbit knee joints. Twenty-four adult rabbits were randomly divided into 3 groups. One was used as normal control. Two were divided into two experimental groups (0.4% and 2.0% hyaluronic acid groups). In each group, the right knee joints were injected with 0.4% or 2.0% hyaluronic acid, and the left knees were injected with an equal volume of phosphate buffered saline. After 3 months, the knee joints were dissected, and the cartilage of the medial and lateral femoral condyle in each knee was subjected to macroscopic and histological examinations. The cartilage volume loss of the medial condyle was less in the 2.0% hyaluronic acid group (P 0.05). The cartilage volume loss of the lateral condyle was less in the 2.0% hyaluronic acid group (P 0.05). Histological
