T cells require direct interaction with specific antigen to mediate their effector function. This functional activation can be considered to comprise two stages. In the first, specific recognition of antigen is mediated by T-cell receptors, typically specific for peptide fragments of the antigen. In the second, antigen needs to interact with pre-formed surface molecules of the antigen-presenting cell to induce functional activation. This second interaction is termed co-stimulation and is needed for efficient T-cell activation. Recent studies have begun to unravel the mechanisms of co-stimulation, which revolve around binding of the B7 molecule, first identified on B cells, to the T-cell receptor. Further, the B7 molecule appears to be a ligand for an additional T-cell receptor, CTLA-4, which requires the co-stimulatory molecule CD28 for activation. The question of whether recognition of antigen by T-cell receptors induces co-stimulation or whether it requires costimulation for expression of T-cell function remains to be resolved. A court has today sentenced former Australian Test cricketer Brett Lee to a community service order and 12 months' supervision after he was convicted on September 12 of causing death by dangerous driving. Lee's life has been put on hold for the next 12 months and he is obliged to undergo a risk assessment to determine if he poses any threat to the community. The prosecution was convinced Lee was a high risk to other road users.
