Embrilliance simplifies one or both functions of the Embroidery Workstation. Embrilliance includes software that allows the user to perform.Numerous different types of containers are used to process foodstuffs into cooked product suitable for human consumption. One type of such container is a trommel of the type used in the processing of whole, uncooked product, such as foodstuffs. Trommels are generally employed in the processing of such products as a means of first breaking up the product into the desired size for processing and to prevent the product from sticking to a trommel's surface. Due to the nature of the trommel, it is desirable to reuse the trommel as many times as possible without any substantial down time. A problem which arises with trommels in processing products is that various foreign objects get caught within the trommel, causing the trommel to clog or become damaged. This problem is aggravated when the trommel is used for processing uncooked products, such as whole birds or uncooked products such as foodstuffs, because such foreign objects are generally more easily caught within the trommel. In order to clean a trommel, a trommel must be first taken off line. The trommel must then be disassembled and the interior of the trommel cleaned out. Once cleaned, the trommel must be reassembled and the trommel reinserted into the system. While this procedure is a typical method of cleaning a trommel, it entails a substantial amount of time. Because it takes a substantial amount of time to clean a trommel, this method of cleaning is a significant drawback. In addition, disassembling, cleaning and reassembling of a trommel for purposes of cleaning is not only a time consuming, labor intensive and costly process. The costs involved with cleaning a trommel is also quite substantial. In fact, the time and expense involved with cleaning a trommel can often be so substantial as to make such cleaning a prohibitively expensive proposition. Various solutions have been proposed to alleviate the clogging problems of trommels. For example, one system utilizes a cutting knife in combination with a trommel. The knife is moved in the path of the trommel to cut non food product material that have become caught in the trommel or other processing device. Other systems move trommels through reciprocating or oscillating devices. d0c515b9f4
