Insulin-like growth factor-I (IGF-I) is one of the most important growth and differentiation factors in the body. IGF-I stimulates cell proliferation by cross-talk through the IGF-I receptor and mitogen-activated protein kinases (MAPKs). We investigated the mechanism by which IGF-I receptor signal activates MAPKs and caused proliferation of endothelial cells (ECs). We made cDNA clones with point mutations to interfere with specific tyrosine phosphorylation sites of the IGF-I receptor. The mutant receptors were analyzed by immunoprecipitation and subsequent phosphorylation assay. ECs were transfected with plasmids containing these mutant IGF-IR cDNA and then treated with exogenous IGF-I. In ECs expressing wild-type IGF-IR, IGF-I time-dependently increased tyrosine phosphorylation of the IGF-
