Hd fatxbox explorer version 1.4 downloadMars mystery may be solved by methane detection A satellite orbiting Mars has stumbled on a possible explanation for a mysterious spike in atmospheric methane detected several years ago. The international Mars Express mission detected the annual spikes of methane and is now analyzing them. The findings, published in Nature on Thursday, suggest that the methane is coming from a naturally occurring combination of water and carbon dioxide on Mars and could be coming from an underground ocean of liquid water. The research, which builds on studies in which Dr. Smith and others were a part, has important implications for understanding past Martian conditions, for looking for life on Mars and for the search for extraterrestrial life in the solar system, said Geordie Brown, director of the Planetary Science Institute and a principal investigator of the Mars Express mission. "The methane mystery has been one of the most vexing aspects of recent Mars studies," Dr. Brown said. "This research definitively pinpoints the source of that methane and is the first to actually test that hypothesis." The instrument on Mars Express, called the Thermal Emission Spectrometer (TES), a gamma ray spectrometer in the satellite, was built and tested in the United States by the University of Hawaii and the United States Geological Survey. It pointed toward the planet for years before scientists realized that it was picking up the signature of the methane.Navigating care across competing priorities: Examining the role of care demands in moderating the associations
