Buy and download: Field of the Invention This invention relates to the application of ultrasound for cleaning the bore of a jet pump. 2. Description of the Prior Art Jet pumps have been widely used for some time. In a typical situation, a liquid or slurry is fed into the housing of the jet pump and expelled through a small orifice at the tip of a jet tube; the liquid is impacted against an opening in a surrounding element such as the floor of a channel or tank, and the impact is enlarged by a diffuser. One of the principal uses of a jet pump is in a variety of post treatment applications, particularly where the liquid being pumped contains a suspended solid component. The common situation is found, for example, in waste water treatment plants where the slurry includes both solid and liquid components. The solid components are precipitated as a precipitate by the action of the jet pump, and then the precipitate is removed as a sludge by a sedimentation process. In other situations, the liquid component is processed, as by degrading the organic constituents of the liquid. Jet pumps are used in conjunction with a number of diffuser types, including those known as swan neck diffusers, and flat plate diffusers. The swan neck diffuser is shown, for example, in U.S. Pat. No. 2,946,342 to Powers, wherein the diffuser tube is connected between the outlet of the jet pump and a feed tank. The diffuser is of the type having a first end leading to the feed tank and a second end leading to the outlet of the jet pump. The material of the diffuser tube is chosen to have a relatively high amount of a repellant material, and it will become clear to the skilled artisan that the usual diffusion ends in a vertical wall extending perpendicularly between the first and second ends. The wall has a thickness of about 5 to 9 mm, the usual distance between the outlet of the pump and the inlet to the feed tank. The diffuser type shown in Powers is also used with flat plate diffusers, in which the outlet of the jet pump is in direct contact with a flat plate. In this instance, the material of the flat plate diffuser is the same as the material of the diffuser tube of the Powers swan neck diff
