A multimodal therapy approach in the treatment of chronic abdominal pain in children. Background Abdominal pain in children is a common condition seen in clinical practice. The goal of this study was to assess a multimodal therapy approach to patients with chronic abdominal pain and to evaluate its efficacy. Methods A prospective randomized, controlled, double-blind study was carried out on 74 children with chronic abdominal pain, aged between 2 and 10 years. Twenty-four children were randomly divided into 2 groups. Group 1 received multimodal therapy including the administration of a drink (20 ml/day) containing a mixture of fatty acids (18 : 3omega, 6 : 0, 12 : 0) and ursodeoxycholic acid (500 mg/day) and the administration of amitriptyline (10 mg/day). Group 2 (control group) received only the oral administration of water and ursodeoxycholic acid. The treatment was administered during 14 days. Pain levels and other related symptoms were assessed at the beginning of the study and after 14 days of therapy by means of a visual analog scale, the abdominal child pain questionnaire, and the abdominal child pain questionnaire. The results obtained after a four-week follow-up were analyzed by using the chi(2) and Student's t tests. Results All 74 patients treated with the multimodal therapy had a significant reduction in the intensity of pain (p 0.05). Conclusions Multimodal therapy is an effective approach to the treatment of chronic abdominal pain in children. Given everything that we know about the Trump White House's official narrative, it's somewhat astonishing that The New York Times is releasing a gushing profile of Steve Bannon, Donald Trump's chief White House strategist, while the president has accomplished so little in office — and so much on it. The article, in today's Times, is nothing short of celebratory. Bannon is, the headline declares, "the ideological heart of the Trump team and the power base of the nationalist wing of the Republican Party." Bannon is quoted approvingly as describing the American "ceaseless struggle to reclaim the hegemony of our history and the authenticity of our culture."
