Bite-to-Bite or Bite-To-Breathe: Effects of a Modified Nose-Pinch Test on Ventilatory Response to Presynaptic Stimulus During Hemineural Hearing Loss. We examined the effects of a modified nose-pinch test (mNPT) on the ventilatory response to 5-ms tone bursts at 60-dB sound pressure level (SPL) using capnography. We hypothesized that mNPT affects the balance between the afferent and efferent control of ventilatory response. We enrolled 28 adults who showed no abnormal findings on audiograms and a positive response to the mNPT. We modified the mNPT by placing a bite around the second molar and applied it to our subjects who sat comfortably in a quiet room. One ear was randomly selected for stimulation in the 10- to 30-Hz range (high-frequency range [HFR]) and the other in the 1- to 4-Hz range (low-frequency range [LFR]). During baseline, the peak tidal inspiratory flow of each response and the ratio between the peak tidal inspiratory flow and peak tidal expiratory flow as a measure of respiratory load were calculated. After the mNPT, the HFR response was enhanced, and the ratio was not significantly altered, whereas the LFR response was inhibited, and the ratio was significantly reduced. Ventilatory control during mNPT was balanced between the afferent and efferent control. The mNPT was useful for detecting weak afferent signals. Furthermore, the HFR response was enhanced when listening to a speech communication in noise, whereas the LFR response was inhibited, indicating that the mNPT was useful for examining the afferent control of the VOR and for detecting weak afferent signals.
