In a communication system, a transmitter transmits a signal to a receiver via a physical medium. The transmitter modulates a carrier signal with an information signal, and transmits the modulated carrier signal over the physical medium. Upon receipt, the receiver demodulates the received carrier signal to recover the information signal. When the physical medium is a free-space medium, such as the atmosphere, or a guided medium, such as optical fiber or wire transmission lines, the communication system is termed an atmospheric optical communication system or guided optical communication system, respectively. FIG. 1 illustrates a typical guided optical communication system. A fiber optic transceiver 10 comprises a transmitter section and a receiver section. The transmitter section generally comprises a laser for providing the optical beam used to transmit the information, a beam modulator for modulating the laser with an information signal, and a coupling lens 12, a collimator lens 14, and an optical fiber 16 for transmitting the modulated optical beam over a guided medium 20, e79caf774b
