I have a project with many different types of surveys, each of them with different rules and some of the rules have different outcomes based on the survey type. Is there a way to make a custom rule for one survey type and apply it to other survey types? I'm trying to avoid re-inventing the wheel, since I don't want to have to maintain one rule, but use it in many different surveys. A: There are two approaches I can think of. If your surveys have particular data-sets to process, then your surveys can have a "data-set" type. Within the survey you can use the data-sets and select the appropriate rule for that data-set within the survey. You would also have a table of data-set types. When a survey is created, a single choice can be made for data-set-type, which will then lock the choice of data-sets within the survey. The second approach would be to have different surveys, each survey type with the different rules. Q: Prevent searchBox from keyDown I've got an ASearchBar an a searchBox. When the user starts to type something into the searchBox, the keyboard pushes down the view. I want to solve this by getting an image below the searchBox. I have already set "Search in Appearing Views" to "Never". My code is: ASearchBar *searchBar = [[[UIApplication sharedApplication] delegate] window].searchBar; searchBar.delegate = self; [searchBar sizeToFit]; searchBar.autocorrectionType = UITextAutocorrectionTypeNo; searchBar.translatesAutoresizingMaskIntoConstraints = NO; And if there is some other solution than "never" that would be a positive suggestion, too

Yet it was more than 10 years ago. It was Nov. 8, 2003. The Astros came into Wrigley on a nine-game losing streak and opened the game with a three-run homer by Michael Bourn. Ortiz hit his first of three homers in the second, and this one made everyone forget all about the Astros
