According to Ryans, a former fullback for the San Francisco 49ers, the only time Americans are ever going to come together is when you're forced to do so and can't leave a gun in your house. As a reminder, Ryans is now part of the Nike company, but he was fired from the company in 2015 before he even stepped foot on the field. Q: Quadrature for MIDI notes What is the traditional way to invert a MIDI note? The more traditional note chart I see is a straight line from octave to octave, so all notes in the same octave are the same pitch. For example, C is C, D is D, E is E, and so on. This has the advantage of consistency for the note-color however a drawback is that many non-Western notes will have the exact same sounding pitch. I know there are ways to do this with pre-digital tuners. How do pre-digital tuners deal with a piano tuned using a digital tuner? A: When using a software piano or a virtual piano, the same note may sound different depending on how it is played. That could happen if you are using a different octave for the playing than the composer had in mind. In reality, most people would play the same note at the same octave as the composer, which means they would be satisfied with a 'C' in the first octave and a 'D' in the second. A: This question has a few assumptions that I will identify. First, let's figure out whether the composer really wanted a different note. If the composer is using an organ, then there would be a loud and soft pedal that inverts both the pianist and the organist. (Or there might be no pedals at all: a grand might have no pedals; one might have tone and sustain pedals.) In any case, there should be a "correct" position, and that should be supported. (Cleaning the chords, for example, might cause the piano to loose some volume. But if you really need low volume, then you might get away with producing a thicker low end than is required by the composer.) I think your question is really: How should one set up the piano sound? There is one non-standard option I can think of: hum. Let's say you have the left and right channels are muted. Then, you would play the chord with the left hand, while simultaneously playing an artificial note with your right hand, which sounds a note that is one octave down. I think this would produce a reasonable result, providing: the artificial note played with the right hand is loud enough, (a reference to the volume of the left hand) it is clear that you
