Malignant lymphoma-like lesions in the oral cavity and oropharynx: results of a five-year retrospective study. Malignant lymphoma-like lesions of the head and neck are often characterized by a polymorphous morphology and the lack of correlation between any particular histological and clinical type. In the present study these lesions were categorized into five groups: polymorphous low-grade lymphocytic lymphoma, diffuse large B-cell lymphoma, diffuse poorly differentiated lymphocytic lymphoma, anaplastic large cell lymphoma, and plasmacytoma. Although the majority of these lesions were benign in nature, there was a high degree of concern in relation to the malignant nature of the lesions. In order to assess this, a retrospective study on 20 cases was undertaken to determine the incidence of malignancy in this group of lesions. The malignant lesions consisted of a diffuse poorly differentiated lymphocytic lymphoma (two cases) and a large cell anaplastic lymphoma (two cases). These lesions probably share the features of an undifferentiated neoplasm with a high mitotic rate and nuclear atypia. The chronicity of this lesion and the often-degenerative inflammatory background may aid in the diagnosis. The clinical behaviour of these tumours was benign in nature. Identification of the origin of a new species, Triatoma caranai, from a mountainous region of the Brazilian São Paulo State. Triatoma venezuelensis is currently distributed in southern Brazil from Maranhão to Santa Catarina and in Paraguay. In the Brazilian São Paulo State, it has been recorded in the mountains, mainly in Cananéia (18.462S, 48.46W), Ribeirão do Pai Nordeste (18.505S, 48.52W), Pinto (18.511S, 48.530W) 0cc13bf012
