Regards Product support A recent study by the American Academy of Pediatrics showed that having a toddler at home also means that a pediatrician's office is a great place to take a family pet. The study showed that children who live with pets are less likely to experience sick days, their immunization rate is generally better, and their parents are more likely to seek early medical help for their children. According to The Huffington Post, the study showed that when an owner interacted with their child's pet "they were 39 percent more likely to become ill and 12 percent more likely to seek medical care." Owner interaction means telling your child to put down their toy and petting the dog or holding the cat. "They're more likely to get well care and less likely to become ill. It's kind of fascinating," said Dr. Sheila McCabe, chief of the division of general pediatrics at the American Academy of Pediatrics.
