COOK's light and dark basting brush by marcad 1 and 1/2 inch... i have many brushes, including the most popular ones, like the ones by Sargent & Green, which are tried and true, but I've lately been loving those leather handled Sargent brushes made by hand. The Sargent brush I have has a pattern on it showing it was made by hand, so there is some little detail in the design, which makes it feel so much better than the plastic handles you see on a lot of those brushes. I use the marcad brush mostly for texture and lightly back applying the glaze. I want a nice soft creamy texture in my glaze, and the marcad brush feels just right to me for that. I have a mix of copper and dark glazes for my different cake pans, so my glaze set is a little different than a lot of people, but that's ok with me. Of course, I have a couple of the cheaper brushes like the zephyrs, fil brushes, etc. I use them for a more scrubby texture in my glaze, but the marcad brush is by far my favorite for light texturing. The third favorite of mine is a china brush. I love that one, too, but the material is a little thin, and the point is so tiny you can't get it to really firm up a glaze, so it is useless to me for deep texturing. I have a long handled Ergoswitch, too, that looks nice when the brush is resting in the palm of your hand. The various shaped glaze brushes, like the one on the right on the Sargent site, are nice, but I find them just as useful for the soft texturing with the marcad brush. Once I get more experience, I'll get better at the different texturing styles, and it'll be interesting to see what I learn about them, but the one thing I definitely have found, is that those brushes are worth the investment. You have to take the time to make yourself a selection guide, so you don't end up with a bunch of different brushes when you need a particular one. But overall, I really like the marcad brush, and recommend it to anyone that is
