Impact of nutritional support on the intestinal mucosa and systemic immune function. Enteral nutrition (EN) is an important component of optimal care for patients with gastrointestinal disease who have normal nutritional reserves. At present, the available evidence suggests that EN is beneficial for the recovery of intestinal function and is associated with improved protein and energy metabolism, immune function, and overall patient outcome. However, adequate evidence regarding the effects of EN on the intestinal mucosa is lacking. Therefore, the purpose of this review was to summarize the available evidence on the direct impact of EN on the intestinal mucosa. The studies included in this review were selected from a search of MEDLINE, Cumulative Index to Nursing and Allied Health Literature, and Embase from January 1966 through October 2007. Studies were selected based on their relevance to the topic, human subjects, and English-language availability. The following data were abstracted from each study: study design, number of patients, characteristics of EN, primary outcome, results, and limitations. The search revealed 32 studies addressing the impact of EN on the intestinal mucosa. Most were prospective studies, and all demonstrated a positive impact of EN on the intestinal mucosa, with individual studies demonstrating a benefit in as much as 67% to 100% of patients. Mucosal improvement was seen in ileum, jejunum, and colon. EN also demonstrated a benefit in systemic immune function and an increased number of circulating lymphocytes and monocytes. EN has a positive impact on the intestinal mucosa in a majority of patients with gastrointestinal disease and may be beneficial in restoring mucosal epithelial integrity, fostering local immune function, and reducing systemic immune suppression.

The Art of Aging: Taking it Easy Let's face it: Some of us are just lucky. We can walk outside the door in the morning without catching our breath or crawling to the toilet to take a dump. We don't get winded when we walk uphill or have to pull ourselves up with our hands on a windowsill. We can drive down the road without passing out or needing to pull over to vomit. At least we don't have an age-related degenerative disease like Parkinson's or Alzheimer's that gradually deprives us of our ability to care for our needs. But most of us aren't that lucky. We struggle through each day, taking care of our needs, frailties and burdens. We are challenged by a high frequency of colds and infestations

MR and MD maps of residual activities: an application to a realistic phantom model. The use of a realistic phantom model of the heart and coronary circulation in this work, which has been developed and implemented in Matlab, is shown to be useful for testing the efficiency of the quantitative methods usually employed with the aim of extracting local muscle metabolic rates. A statistical study of the whole-heart velocity-encoded (VEC) R-fMRI data of a seven-chamber human cardiac phantom has been carried out. The investigation was carried out using six different VEC-R-fMRI acquisitions corresponding to different tissue velocity encoding (TE = 5, 10, 15, 20, 25 and 30 ms) and experimental points-of-interest (EOI) positions. The ranges of mean muscle and blood velocities resulted of about 0-2.5 cm/s and 0-1.4 cm/s, respectively. A robust method was developed for the extraction of the local respiratory-related signal contribution from the VEC-R-fMRI data and the estimation of local rates by using a fast sum of products (SOP) algorithm. A comparison between the SOP and traditional methods like the sliding window and adaptive selection was performed. The results were satisfactory in the assessment of the spatial uniformity of the MR and MD values, even though the study was carried out in a phantom environment. In addition, the temporal characteristics of the signal variation were also studied. Antibody response to peptides of the major sperm protein (MSP) in cynomolgus monkeys infected with a wild-type or recombinant Trypanosoma cruzi clone. Seven peptides, P1 to P7, of the major sperm protein (MSP) of Trypanosoma cruzi were synthesized. They comprised fragments of the entire sequence of the protein, designed according to its antigenicity. The peptides were coupled to bovine serum albumin (BSA) and used as immunogens for antibody production in mice. Immunization with the peptides conjugated to BSA induced antibody synthesis directed to the parasite-derived antigens. The natural antibody levels against the seven peptides of MSP were studied in cynomolgus monkeys (Macaca fascicularis) experimentally infected with a wild-type clone of T. cruzi (C-8a) or a clone with impaired ability to infect macrophages (T. cruzi-SM T. cruzi-CM).
