Here is a demo of Live help 123 to show how you can use it.The human immunodeficiency virus (HIV) which causes acquired immune deficiency syndrome (AIDS) is known to reproduce in cells bearing the CD4 surface molecule. These cells are destroyed in AIDS patients. We have shown, using immune electron microscopy of infected cells, that the CD4 molecule is associated with small aggregates of protein, a finding that was supported by electron microscopic immunogold labeling. We have also shown that the CD4 aggregates undergo antigenic shifts and that the shifts are triggered by the presence of HIV envelope and non-viral gene products. The antigenic shifts are induced in cells bearing mutant CD4 molecules and correspond to the appearance of a new determinant on the CD4 molecule. This antigenic shift phenomenon suggests that the CD4 aggregates may serve as a virus assembly site. We wish to determine if these CD4 aggregates are an integral feature of the virus particle and if their appearance triggers the virus to assemble at a different site. Furthermore, we wish to determine if the appearance of the CD4 aggregates
