Wed, 05 Sep 2016 14:36:12 +0000Expanding an elite archival network: the California State Chemical Laboratories (CALBCD). Substantial efforts have been made to identify and establish multiple archival repositories for chemical agents used in the United States during the twentieth century. These government-sponsored facilities host several chemical agents, including nerve agents, mustard gas (chemical warfare agent), phosgene (chemical warfare agent), and nerve gas components (chemical warfare agent). As chemical agents have become more widely used and debated, other archival facilities have emerged to host archival materials. These stockpiled materials can be licensed to faculty and graduate students for research or classroom work and are collectively referred to as "access collection." As CALBCD works to meet the varied needs of chemists, this includes distribution of access collections. This approach has yielded enormous benefits, yet it also carries the risk of simultaneous distribution of duplicate or inadequate collections. To develop a sound strategy for expanding CALBCD's access collection, it is necessary to evaluate CALBCD's collections first. Items may not fit cleanly into a category, and the absence of any collection means that such items do not, at least at this time, have a CALBCD archival repository. Eventually, as collections emerge over time, it should be possible to ensure collections are consolidated and co-located where possible. Furthermore, to maximize the value of CALBCD's access collections, work with CALBCD's existing contacts and rebuild CALBCD's contacts list should begin now. The present invention relates to a new and improved construction of a

It's going to be an interesting year in GOP politics. The 2010 election cycle presents Democrats with a tough fight and Obama and the Democrats need to win in order to stay in power. On the other hand, 2010 will probably be the last opportunity for Republicans to make waves in the House and Senate. By the end of this year, four of the six most competitive Senate races could end up with Democrats and with five of the most competitive House races already in their hands (likely to stay in Democratic control). Even among potential Republican pickups, there's not much chance for folks like Eric Cantor (R-VA) and Ben Nelson (D-NE) to slip out of their seats; however, we'll soon see how hard it will be for Republicans to hang on to Florida, Indiana, Montana, and North Carolina, which are showing some very competitive races. If the GOP's strength comes mainly from swing states, then 2010 could be the last opportunity for Republicans to regain that majority, and there are some

real races to watch. First, let's start with the Senate. NUMBER 5: BILL HEMMER VS. TOM HARKIN [photo from the National Geographic]: In 2002, a Democrat, Mary Landrieu, was elected to represent Louisiana in the U.S. Senate. Now, six years later, a Republican is challenging her. There are five other seats in the Senate up for grabs this year (only the aforementioned Landrieu is a Democrat), and two are currently held by Democrats (Delaware's Joe Biden and Missouri's Claire McCaskill). On the surface, it looks like a solid fit for Republicans, with President Obama polling poorly in the state, and the national momentum going their way. However, Dem strongholds tend to have different vulnerabilities than open seats, and this race comes down to how voters feel about Landrieu, not about Obama. A recent Gallup Poll reveals that only 30% of registered voters have a favorable opinion of the Louisiana senator, but that number has gone down to 28% since September. Of course, that only accounts for registered voters. Still, it's worth looking at exactly how voters feel about Landrieu. According to a Gallup-Healthways poll in August, voters in the state still like her. Almost half of the respondents said that she's doing a good job as a Senator, and she scored 10% higher
