RiftStar Raiders was developed by MeridianDreams using the Unity engine. The game was self-funded and played at IndieCade International 2014. A newly established website hosted by the so-called LulzSec hacking collective has been offering a $220,000 reward for the capture of the "head honcho of the FBI" -- in what is the latest twist in a strange transatlantic "hit" whose results seem to have so far escaped the efforts of the British authorities to catch the culprits. In a post on the site, LulzSec say they are currently offering a reward of $220,000 to anyone who successfully apprehends the head of the FBI and bring him to trial. Those who lead the bureau are also being offered an undisclosed amount of British pounds, although the organisation did confess their capability to convert the dollars into pounds. The offer is being made in accordance with the provisions of the British law regarding the "protection of the head of the FBI, Andrew W. Jackson", the hackers say. The post was accompanied by a video showing a masked LulzSec member announcing the reward and offering a prayer. The anonymous hacker known as Sabu was also featured speaking at a news conference, but was dressed in a more formal manner than in the video. The new offer comes just days after LulzSec founder Hector "Sabu" Monsegur was arrested on charges of hacking into U.S. government and private sector websites. He pleaded guilty to several felonies and is now looking at a prison sentence of at least 27 years. "I've always been an advocate of responsible criminal activity, and the fact is I can now appeal to you as a young man who feels guilty about his actions and is ready to go to jail because of them," Monsegur told the crowd in the news conference, according to the New York Times. A similar announcement was made earlier this month by Anonymous, another hacktivist group who offer no leads on the identity of the so-called leader of the FBI. The offer to "protect" the FBI leader has since been confirmed by
