Australia's teenagers are in the grip of a heroin epidemic that is sending record numbers to hospital with injuries related to the drug. Key points: Drug overdoses are the leading cause of death among 15-year-olds in Australia, says a national study Drug overdoses are the leading cause of death among 15-year-olds in Australia, says a national study The trend is thought to be driven by a huge increase in the sale of ice, and other synthetic drugs The trend is thought to be driven by a huge increase in the sale of ice, and other synthetic drugs The head of the Australian Drug Law Enforcement Agency is urging parents to be vigilant and take action to stop their children using The study by the University of NSW, showed in the past three years, the number of 15-year-olds who were admitted to hospital for drug overdoses in NSW, has tripled. The ACT followed, with the figure rising by more than 80 per cent to 168 hospitalised overdoses in the same three-year period. Victoria was the worst hit with 216 hospital admissions. In NSW, the study found 1,012 15-year-olds were hospitalised in the past three years, with drug overdoses being the leading cause of admission in this age group. John Wilson, head of the Australian Drug Law Enforcement Agency, said the figures were alarming. "There is almost no context in which you can actually explain the increase in overdoses and hospitalisations," he said. "The national figures are at a level of what was previously thought to be an epidemic. "We are tracking this at a time when the availability of a wide range of drugs is increasing very significantly." In NSW, police are working to control the growing trend of syringes being left in public places, which have become the primary source of the opioid drug Suboxone. Got a confidential news tip?
