Locals in the Hamptons welcomed the U.S. Supreme Court on Monday to hear arguments in a case that could redefine the boundaries of public access to the nation's coastline. Whether an obstruction, such as a barrier reef, makes a shoreline inaccessible to the public for purposes of accessing federal waters under the Coastal Zone Management Act and the United States Constitution remains at the center of the case involving the old Atlantic Avenue Pier in East Hampton. On Monday, the justices heard oral arguments in the case of New York et al. v. United States, which challenges the constitutionality of a permit system for land management within the coastal zone overseen by the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service. Each locality is allocated a share of coastal zone federal waters under the act passed in 1972, which is commonly known as the Jones Act. The land use of the portion of the coastal zone set aside for public access, also known as public recreation access, is left largely to the states. The agency oversees public recreation by giving coastal zone permits for access and by requiring that future development plan for public access and by designating a public access route. The U.S. attorney's office for the Eastern District of New York sued to block a public access permit for the pier in East Hampton, a massive structure that rises high out of the ocean, in October 2016. It represents a project to rebuild the pier's seawall, remove the rock pylons and replace them with concrete. The island's local government said the purpose of the pier is not recreation and that the case involved setting local rules for planning, as well as interpreting federal law. Their case is supported by maritime transportation companies, including maritime trusts and shipbuilders such as Clyde Shipbuilding Co. of Halifax, Nova Scotia, and industry groups. Their case is opposed by the government and businesses, including maritime trust groups and Carnival Cruise Lines. It is supported by recreational groups, including the Surfrider Foundation, the National Audubon
