California gears up for battle over global warming: 'We're not just going to be putting in a bunch of money to be able to say we're doing our part.' The California Air Resources Board has approved an ambitious plan to reduce emissions, but the state faces a battle over the amount of money spent to curb global warming, an issue that has split government and industry. Even as California prepares to emit more carbon dioxide than the rest of the world combined, smog-busting measures have stalled in the Republican-controlled Congress. While the state has the authority to put its own limits on pollution, it doesn't have any money to pay for them. Experts differ on whether the federal government would also need to chip in to the state's ambitious program to fight global warming. The $4.5 billion plan would cut emissions from cars, trucks and light trucks by 25 percent by the year 2025, compared with a 1990 standard, while expanding the state's existing greenhouse gas limits for other polluting sources. This summer, CARB is slated to introduce a separate program that would not only limit pollution for new homes and buildings, but also retrofit existing buildings. That can't happen unless the state comes up with the money to do it. "It's going to be like a transfer of wealth," said Jessa Cruickshank of the nonprofit Climate Change Solutions. "It's going to be a big shift." California's governor, Jerry Brown 6d1f23a050
