DAVID WHITE / FAIRFAX NZ Auckland Transport's acting chief executive Aaron Moody answers questions about the organisation's plans for public transport, at an Auckland Transport Board meeting in Auckland. Transport Commissioner Russell Brown has been scathing of the organisation, saying the city's public transport strategy was "worthless" and Auckland's lack of good public transport was its biggest challenge. READ MORE: Auckland's public transport master plan not worth the paper it's written on Brown also questioned the organisation's strategy around rail, saying the $45 billion in projects should have been planned for much earlier. The agency's acting chief executive, Aaron Moody, took to Twitter to respond to the review, defending the organisation's record and saying its projects were delivered on time. "@nztransport @transportcomnz #T3Review don't understand why @AaronMoody decided to post on his personal account. Sure as hell doesn't show any of the quality of work undertaken by my team," he said. "I am honoured that Russell Brown considers our team's work to be 'amazing'. "We are a 1,400-person organisation, with 90 teams across 8 regions, 65 of which are full time. "Our most high profile project, the third-rail underpass from Hobson St to Wynyard, is now just about to get underway. Even Russell knows this project was completed
